The most basic tool for working with DSLR and propped camera photos is the clone stamp, which makes it easy to remove unwanted elements like people or backgrounds from close-ups and portraits. If you want to adjust a specific area of a photo, you have a set of problem solving tools, like the magic wand, that can take care of those situations. But, in reality, until you understand the fundamentals of the image, you won't be able to judge if you're getting the most out of the photo. Always remember, the best way to learn what's good or bad in the image is to study it first with the fundamentals sorted out. You can combine several layers into a new group. To do this, click the green plus or minus buttons on the tool bar. This will create a new group layer on top of your current active group. Any subsequent layers you add to this group will be added to the group layer. To remove layers from the group, click the red minus sign next to the group layer. 933d7f57e6
