The basic 30-day free trial allows you to try out Lightroom 4 yourself, but it's disappointing that the "right-click" menu functionality doesn't work as it used to in previous versions. It's hard to tell if it's a bug, a feature, or if something was carried over from Lightroom Classic. I'm willing to live with it as long as there's an option to send a link to the output rather than letting someone else access an unregistered version. The aforementioned "single window mode" (F10) is a big hit. A great addition since it's a seemingly small change that helps you focus on the image itself without having to navigate through various tabs and windows. The new Shake Filter offers dynamic camera shake reduction. While it's not a perfect fix, a lot of noise and fly-by-wire practically disappear from handheld shots. The only issue is that it doesn't work with automatic exposure bracketing, a function that was once a staple of camera systems.

I was ordered to shop the DXO Lab: 40 to 150mm to achieve a stopwise equivalent of the 35mm. This is a continual study for me in terms of lenses for DX. In DX, do I need a 35mm to cover the 35mm range of the Panny (and similar lens)? It appears to me that a 40mm does 95% of the work and a 70mm does most of the work. I don't get people using and buying close to 200 mm lenses in DX. Hi,

I am using Photopad less and less because it's missing a few features such as detection of HSL and Color temperature. And that is not a feature of Lightroom 5. I use to use Lightroom 4 for all my editing, and now that I am using Photoshop, I have a decision to make: use both apps or just Lightroom. Any time I have to convert PSD to DNG in Photoshop, I lose time. Does anyone know if there is any application that will only handle the output that is compatible with Photoshop, or another option to avoid the conversion?

Thanks!
