Another tangible and tangible example of the challenge of creating and maintaining an app like Photoshop as a business . The response to the announcement was not noisy but savvy. The idea is a great one. Market it as a reasonable extension of what bad people do when they want to upgrade a software that they dislike. Upgrade it first and let people rave about how "nice" of you for not changing the logo clueing people to the inevitable wave of features that will come their way. Eventually, people will upgrade. Of course, also keep in mind that angry customers and focus groups are convenient. At the same time, please be aware that historically, a lot of new users simply uninstall the old versions and continue without using the new version. Perhaps it's time to think about that and offer options like the very unpopular Adobe Ideas to make sure those upgraders can actually use the software they have purchased and enjoy it. It must be stressed that the bankruptcy of the Photography division at Adobe was not caused by this announcement and is not a part of the problem. That company most assuredly has great products in traditional imaging and design. Adobe is a multi-billion dollar company and has a legacy of really top-notch tools. The only thing that the announcement seems to have proven is the disrepute surrounding Adobe and its flagship product.
