This can be seen in this satellite image from NASA's Environmental Satellite Tracking and Monitoring (ESTRACE) mission. On Oct. 16, the NASA jetstream began to show signs of disruption, and by Oct. 19, the jetstream had shifted more than it normally would over the Arctic, moving towards Siberia in eastern Russia. This process has been known as an Arctic storm surge. These storms shift from westerly to easterly in the Arctic because of a strengthening north polar jet, and this usually happens in the summer. A strong jet stream is also associated with sea ice. The change in the jetstream is not only visible in this image, but also in the jetstream's wind field
