It's been over a decade since the last major version of Photoshop. This workhorse of the graphic arts industry has matured over that time, and has grown to include multiple mediums and devices in addition to traditional desktop and laptop computers. Today, we're bringing it back to life with a new team, new technologies, and new ideas. In this public beta, we're introducing several new tools. We're also diving deeper into some of the foundational principles that shape the Adobe Photoshop experience, so you can more readily begin using these new tools. We also spent considerable time improving the look and feel and on making Photoshop more approachable, more accessible, and easier to use. In early 2015, we set out to make creative file sizes more manageable with the idea of bringing Photoshop to the web. Our first step was to reimagine the entire application experience. Stripped of the graphic arts baggage, we reframed Photoshop as a world-class image editor. Our customers have often thanked us for moving up, reinventing and personalizing the shopping experience they love. Five years ago, when people would go on shopping websites to find the products they wanted, they had to do it all themselves. Now, our team curates a product collection of over 3,500 items based on real customer preferences and suggests visually striking visual designs. We are continuously working to make the shopping experience more thoughtful, more personalized and more visual. This includes enabling our customers to easily access all their favorite products they've bought from us along with a new way to purchase products even if they've never bought from Adobe. This launch has been a team effort and I wanted to take a moment to spotlight the team who's making it happen. e3d0a04c9c
